

BETH/BECCA

Lights shift to BECCA telling her story to the group.

BECCA

It was a great gift before, especially when I lived in a bigger city. My girlfriend and I would be driving to a restaurant downtown and I'd be like, take the interstate but get off two exits early and take that street all the way down. If we were meeting friends, we'd always get there first. I didn't really hide it, no one needed to know that it was a "gift" or anything, I was just the girl who always knew the fastest way to get places. Then iPhones came out and there was Waze or Google Maps and all of a sudden everyone had my gift. And my friends stopped asking. They just drive wherever their phones tell them to. I have a gift that used to make people sorta happy or at least, on time. Now when I'm giving someone a ride they don't trust where I'm going unless I pretend to check my phone first. It's not lying, exactly. But it feels that way.